Darling Anne Whitney, you never answered my query whether I might run down some day this past week! I warrant you're just sick of writing to people. All the same, I do wish, if you're still there, this glorious weather, that I might spend two-thirds of Thursday with you? If you say yes, I'll catch some morning train; and don't send for me to the station, because I'd just love to walk out to the Point. Can't you fire a post-card at me soon?

I begin to realize how fast and furiously my days are filling up. Friday I have to go to New York on business, (Doesn't that sound grand?) and shall have to stay till Monday. I haven't been there for fifteen years, and shan't know my way around when I get there! Marmee is ever so well, eats, sleeps, and trots as of old. Hooray!
My love to you. You ought to let me help you with something, I think. Did you approve of my Atlantic thing, or not? You saw it in its unrevised form, I think.

If you're starting for Boston, I'll be back you to the Charlesgate instead. But it would be simpler to turn your back on the sea in this particular October.

Yours always,

Forster.
